Hellow Spars.

The use of boflow spars for boats designed to attain great speed has introduced a new and novel industry requiring workmanship of the finest character. The stick for this purpose is required to be of exceptionally fine and straight grain, and after being roughly shaped is split longitudinally from end to end; the center of each of the balves is then hollowed out, and a greater or less amount is removed, according to the intended location of the spar, the upper spars being much the lighter, These hellows run nearly the length of the spar, great care being essential to have them fellow the taper of the cutside of the spar exactly, to insure quiform thickness at every point - of course when this bus been done and the two halves of the spar replaced in their original position, a circular hole is left in the center of the spar, running nearly the whole, length, and fellowing its taper from end to end. After this the two halves are fastened in place again by means of wooden dowels, which has ten the split together, being placed alternately on either side of the central hollow, and both dowels and split are carefully glued. These dowels vary in size with the size of the spar, but are usually as long as they can be made

As to Cionis. There has been no subject concerning which more lies have been lold than about giants. Until it was found that modern men could not be squeezed into the armor at the Tower, it was taken for granted that we had degenerated in size. This is not only not the case, but in the matter of giants we have the advantage of our predecessors. The Emperor Maximinian indeed was said to have been 834 feet high, but ancient mensuration, especially in the care of an emperor, is not to be trusted; indeed, from its not having made kim taller, it is certain that there was not one else nearly so tall.
